

This image shows a single, heavily damaged page from an old manuscript. The paper is off-white or light cream, showing significant signs of age such as yellowing, foxing, and numerous large, irregular holes of varying sizes, particularly concentrated in the upper right quadrant. There are also several dark, irregular smudges and stains across the surface. The text is written in a dense, cursive Gothic script, likely Latin, arranged in two columns. In addition to the handwritten text, there are several large, dark blue ink marks. These include a prominent 'X' near the top center, a large 'P' on the left side, and several smaller 'P's and 'I's scattered across the page. There are also some faint, illegible markings that appear to be bleed-through from the reverse side of the sheet.
